Do scared rescue dogs bite? Dispelling the myths

Scared dogs like children who have suffered abuse will seek out a corner, possibly shut down & tragically & pitifully allow anything to happen to them. I know a professor in psychology who compared the scared dog she adopted from me to some of the human equivalents that she is familiar with (without compromising data protection).

Fearful dogs shouldn't be branded 'dangerous' or 'aggressive' anymore so than a beaten child who cowers from you. We don't recoil from or condemn them- we help and embrace them with compassion. Educating people in the similarities and differences is vital - humans and canine can both be petrified of your presence- the difference is that the child can cry out 'go away' where as a dog may growl, grab, bare it's teeth, flee from you or remain silent & frozen. Children may grab using their teeth or pinch for example. Whilst the methods that we employ may differ the message is the same. A dog often gives us the very best of their nature in the worse of situations & when we cross their boundaries, block & threaten them & they do nothing or growl then that is the healthiest & most helpful response that you can have.
These lost souls have the right to bite but they often don't take it.
They have had their personalities suppressed & beaten out of them & they rarely react AT ALL. It might be the pedigree, purchased, none-rescue & often spoiled pooches of our native countries that are reactionary & confident enough to oppose- not the homeless (harmless) Bulgarian rescue. Anyone who says that a scared dog is a danger does them a terrible diservice & themselves an injustice. Of course their are exceptions in both the animal & human world- maybe they are ill, hostile nature (so we don't home them / make friends) or protecting young etc. However no species / country / or sector within it should suffer prejudice for their origin or traumas.
